SEVEN DEADLY SINS

There are pieces of his life
MAR cannot account for.

Hours. Days. Sometimes weeks.

Names disappear. Time disappears.
Parts of himself disappear.

This is not one of those moments.

Here, he remembers everything.

Here, there is clarity.

More than clarity.

This place feels more real than the world he wakes up in.

He kneels in black soil beneath a sky that does not make sense. The field stretches in every direction, rows bending toward horizons that should not exist.

His ceremonial robe spills around him in deep purple and gold. Some of it pools in the dirt. Some of it trails down the rows. Some of it just keeps going. Farther than it should. Past the field. Past the horizon. Into somewhere else. He looks down at the soil. And he knows exactly where he is.

MAR presses a seed into the soil. There are already rows of new growth around him. Still, he reaches for another.

MAR: "I came to UNIQUE looking for redemption."

He studies the seed in his hand.

MAR: "Ronnie came with me." A pause. "For a while, I thought that was enough." The seed disappears beneath the dirt. "It isn't." He looks across the field. "I have spent too much of my life looking backward." Another seed. "At what I was." Another. "At what I destroyed." His hand stops. "I am more interested now in what I can grow." The field seems to stretch farther.

"So I am planting."

Another seed.

"A conversation." Another. "An idea." Another. "An invitation." He looks toward the small shoots breaking through the soil.

"And some will take root soon." A pause. "I am looking for more." A breath. "Not followers. People with hunger." His eyes move across the endless rows.

"People who look at what they have been given and know it is not enough." He reaches for another handful of seeds. Too many for one row.

"A planter does not stop because one seed grows." Another falls. "He plants again." Another. "And again." MAR studies the handful still left in his palm.

"Perhaps that is greed. Wanting more than you need." A faint smile. "I can live with that." He looks out over the field. "I want the World Championship." Pause. "But I want more than that. I want others beside me." A pause. "Others who can see what I see." He looks back toward the rows of newly planted soil. "So I planted the seeds." A faint smile. "And now something is growing."

Silence. The field changes. A young shoot beside MAR bends, its green fading to brown, then black. It collapses. Another follows. Then another. The rot spreads fast through the rows as the soil and sky darken with it. MAR does not move. Beneath the dead field, roots begin to stir. The earth shifts. They twist faster, searching, until a hard corner breaks through the dirt. Glass follows. An old CRT television sits half buried in the soil. The roots crawl over it, wrapping tight around the casing. The screen stays black. Then... FLICKER. Static. Black. FLICKER.

Red. Gone. One final burst of static fills the glass...

One final FLICKER.

the screen comes alive. The static tears away and something burns through the glass in deep red, bright enough to stain the dead field around it. The image holds. No distortion. No mistake.

THE SEERS.

The roots tighten around the television.

Something has taken root.
